CARNIVAL.

Many people are of opinion that the Carnival of 1880 was inferior to that of 1879 in most of the chief points that make up the amusement.

The street decorations were not to say gorgeous, nor the illuminations at all on the scale of former years, but whatever were the shortcomings in these points, the deficiency was more than made up by the unprecedented gathering of masqueraded women. Never at any previous Carnival in this city did the female 'comparsas' figure so prominently or muster so numerously as on the present occasion. Every furniture van in the city was filled with women; and not that we feel in the least disposed to act as censor to the public, or vote against an amusement so thoroughly identified with the people and their customs, nevertheless it grates against every sense of moral training to see the future matrons of Buenos Ayres packed by scores in these vans, dressed fantastically and masked, to parade through our streets, the object of every buffoonery and coarse joke.

Carnival certainly becomes objectionable when the women have to leave their homes to join in companies, to increase the fun or swell the Corso, not in respectable coaches but hired furniture vans; and we record our protest against this innovation, which spoils the drama of unreal life that the domino and pagame plays in our streets. The Corso is by far the most attractive part of the amusement. In the number of its carriages, dressing of the horses, and display of flowers and green branches on the coaches and coach-wheels, it was in no way inferior to that of last year.

The ladies and children seemed dressed for a ball, and the gay colour of their head-dresses and shawls added to their beauty. The Corso, however, would have been infinitely more attractive had the private carriages been kept together and freed from the interruption of decorated bread-carts and female furniture vans. An overdone Carnal is, perhaps, of all others the most repulsive; and if
